[Kanmangafuchi Abyss]

A beauty spot favored with lava erupted from Mt. Nantai. On the riverside is a huge rock, on which was placed a stone image of Acala (Wisdom King, a fierce Buddhist deity) constructed by Buddhist Bishop Kōkai. There are about 70 Kshitigarbha (bodhisattva who looks over children, travelers and the underworld). Regarding these images of bodhisattva, it is said that every time you count them, you end up with a different count. (That is why they are called Bake Jizō or "The Freak Kshitigarbha.") On the cliff are the Sanskrit characters representing "Kanman," which legend holds were carved by Kōbō-Daishi by throwing writing brushes at it.(ゝ)

[Nikkō Botanical Garden, Tokyo University]

It is officially named the Nikkō Branch Garden, The Botanical Garden Annexed to the Graduate School of Science, University of Tokyo. With a range of mountains more than 2,000 meters high, Nikkō has lakes, swamps, bogs, and other parts of a well-favored natural environment. The Nikkō Botanical Garden cultivates about 2,200 species of plants, including alpine plants, marsh plants, and other native ones.(ゝ)

Jakko Falls

[Jakkō no Taki (Jakkō Falls)]

These falls pour into the swamp that flows into the River Tamozawa. They were named after the Jakkō Temple, which is said to have been established by Kōbō-Daishi in 820. The Jakkō Temple was renamed Jakko Shrine in 1871, when the Jakkō incarnation was abolished because of the governmental policy of separating Buddhism from Shintoism. On the way to the falls is a huge stone called Ikeishi (a pun meaning both "The Pond Stone" and "The Live Stone").

The divine Futarasan Shōin Nikkō mountain by Saint Futarayama mountain was from its old by Kōbō-Daishi cano 2,486 m

久次良神社

[Kujira Shrine]

Founded on September 19, 904. It is reported to have been founded by Nakaomino Kiyohito, the heir of Nakatomo Kiyozane, who was Jūgoinoge (Junior Fifth Rank, Lower Grade). It had formerly been called the Kujira Daimyōjin Shrine. Revered as the Tu Di Gong (the guardian god) of a village, the shrine was renamed the Kujira Shrine in the first year of Meiji (1868). The festival god was Ajisukitakahikone, the guardian for agriculture, fishery, and transportation.

Dainichi Bridge

[Dainichi Bridge]

Built as part of the walking trail project in 2000, this suspension bridge is across the River Daiya. In spring, you can enjoy the cherry blossoms in the surroundings. With the completion of the bridge, it is now easy to cross the River Daiya from the Kanmangafuchi Abyss and go toward National Route 120.

[Takinoo Shrine]
The shrine comes with "The Shrine Gateway for Trial of Luck," which is said to bring luck to anyone throwing three stones at the hole at the shrine gateway and managing to throw at least one of them through the hole, and "The Stone of Childbirths," which is said to favor visitors with childbirths, and "The Match-Making Bamboo Grass," where visitors pray at, along with other popular luck-bringing spots.

[Kaizandō Hall (Temple Hall Commemorating Its Founder)]
When the founder of Nikkō, Saint Shōdō, passed away in 817, his body was cremated at Butsugandani. After that, a hall was built with a vermilion-lacquered multilayered pyramid roof to enshrine the spirit of the saint. The hall also houses the wooden principal image of Kshitigarbha (bodhisattva who looks over children, travelers and the underworld) and the wooden images of the saint's ten disciples reportedly created in the Muromachi era, placed to flank the principal image.

[Kyōshadō Hall and Kannondō Hall]
Cultural assets designated by Tochigi Prefecture. This Kannondō Temple enshrines Kannon, with a Willow Twig in a Vase, known as Yōryū Kannon, also known as Kyōshadō or Shōgikkoma. Since the kyōsha, one of the pieces of the game of shōgi, goes solely straight without going back, this shrine named Kyōshadō is believed to ensure any pregnant woman gives a safe childbirth if she borrows one of these pieces back home and enshrines it on the family altar. After the childbirth, she is supposed to return the borrowed piece and a newly-made piece together to the shrine.

[The Ruins of the Yōgen-in Temple]
The temple was built by Okaji no Kata (Eishō-in) to pray to the Buddha for the repose of the soul of Oroku no Kata (Yōgen-in), a concubine of Tokugawa Ieyasu. Eishō-in was the adoptive mother of the feudal lord Tokugawa Yorifusa, so Yōgen-in was the priests' temple quarters of the Mito family. The temple is also mentioned in Okuno Hosomichi (The Narrow Road through the Deep North) by Matsuo Bashō. The ruins of the temple are now nothing but the two small tombs of Yōgen-in and Eishō-in.

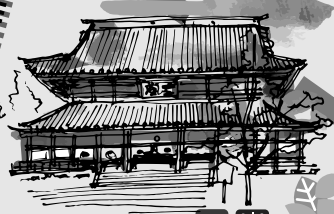

[Nikkō Tōshōgū Shrine]
Of all the shrines and temples, a world heritage representing Japan, the most famous Nikkō Tōshōgū Shrine enshrines Tokugawa Ieyasu. The premises contain eight national treasure buildings, 34 important cultural assets and other buildings (55 structures in total), which are most impressive with their gorgeous, splendid beauty.

[Nikkō-zan Rinnō-ji Temple]
The Rinnō-ji Temple is a generic name for 15 branch sub-temples, including halls and towers. It is registered as part of the world heritage constituting "The Nikkō Shrines and Temples." More than 12 centuries ago, Nikkō founder Saint Shōdō built the Shihonryūji Temple. That was the beginning of all that.

[Shōyōen Garden]
It is famous as a scenic spot for red leaves of Nikkō. It was constructed in the beginning of the Edo era as the garden of the founder's temple with a 12century-long history. After that, it was repeatedly refurbished and is now an interesting, excellent garden showing the traces of changes that took place throughout the Edo era.

Shihonryuji Temple

[Shihonryūji Temple]
The founder of Nikkō, Saint Shōdō had it built as a temple to enshrine Senju Kannon (the Buddhist Goddess of Mercy with a 1000 arms) after crossing the River Daiya. Because four streaks of smoke went up to the sky in the form of a dragon while he was praying, the temple was named "Shihonryūji Temple" (literally, The Temple of Four Main Dragons). The history of Nikkō began with the buildup of the temple by Saint Shōdō in Nikkō.

[Kosugi Hōan Museum of Art, Nikko]
The museum is on a hill facing the red handrails of the Shinkyo Bridge (literally, "God's Bridge"), where the River Daiya and the River Inari converge at Sannai. The Kosugi Hōan Museum of Art, Nikko was built by the former Nikkō-shi municipality as a municipal museum. It comes with a café and a museum shop where visitors can enjoy a relaxed time.
